A Man of Action

The famous Hunt House Car was created by chance by US-cameraman John Roy Hunt, who called himself J. Roy Hunt. Because of his occupation, Mr. Hunt travelled quite a lot, and he wanted to have a possibility of a second home during his travels. Unfortunately it was the middle of the 1930s, and such a vehicle did not exist in the US market. So he decided to create it by himself.

With outstanding craftsmanship and a lot of enthusiasm, he started building his own mobile home based on a Ford truck in 1937. He used aluminum parts from the aviation industry for the construction, and his design integrated the homely accommodation as well as the driver's cab. The Ford-vehicle floor was strengthened with 16 additional steel beams for this new bearing task. With help of a friendly car dealer, he set an aerodynamically sophisticated caravan on its wheels which caused a sensation very soon in the young caravan scene at that time. Primarily it were trailers for trucks and flexible mountable constructions for pickups, so J. Roy Hunt was creating an early shape of a small but quite sufficient caravan. His motorhome, which looked very futuristic at that time, is a milestone in the caravan scene to this day as it was the first vehicle which had a shower on board! The cameraman matched the pulse of the camping world with his do-it-yourself construction and more and more potential buyers approached him to buy this.

In the following years, also during the Second World War, J. Roy Hunt was producing his Motorhome and delivered around 50 examples until 1945. In the course of the years, he has changed the original type slightly, and he could also realize individual wishes at his own production, so that the models are distinguishing in details.
